(57) Abstract :
Following the COVID-19 outbreak, several institutions have turned their attention to the availability and utilization of online and e-learning platforms. For example, Blackboard is an e-learning system with a number of useful features that might be useful during the COVID-19 outbreak. Practical usage of an e-learning system, on the other hand, requires an understanding of the elements that impact adoption as well as the major difficulties that face today's e-learning systems. Information technology substantially impacted elementary education systematically and highly integrated at the start of the twenty-first century. The development of genuinely transformative education for people will be aided by the expansion and evolution of educational technology, which will result in the establishment of non-traditional ways of teaching. Education, knowledge growth, and sharing have never been more important. In light of the relationship between technology growth and changes like educational programme execution, this process compels a rethink of the value and relevance of teaching in general. In addition to information technology, humans continue to play an important role in education. Consequently, university teachers' roles and competencies must be adjusted to match worldwide developments, notably during the Covid-19 pandemic. The research examines and evaluates university instructors' abilities and the value of using information technology into classroom learning.
