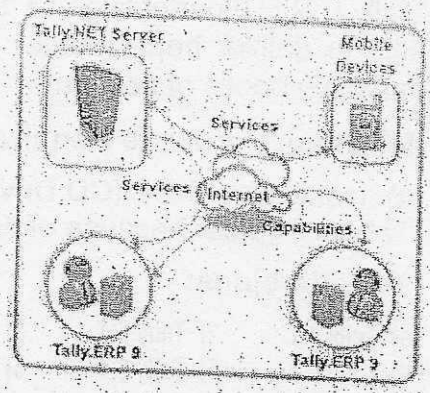
Design and Tally.NET

On a broad level, Tally.ERP 9 comprises of:

- The product itself
- A set of capabilities (enabled via the Internet) by a service called Tally.NET



This 'two component' architecture was chosen as this delivers an unparalleled model, best understood as follows:

Data Design

- Your business data stays with you, locally, and is never stored on Tally.NET servers or on
- systems accessing that data via Remote Access.
- Information in the form of queries and support issues logged via the integrated Support Centre are stored on the Tally.NET servers – as this data is not specific to a company in Tally.ERP 9 - and you have access to all this data from all your branches.
- Account specific data serial numbers, licenses and their status, version information across sites, specific configurations and restrictions are also stored on the Tally.NET servers. Among other advantages, this relieves you from maintaining your own central administration database.

Security Design

- Every Tally.ERP 9 connects to Tally.NET as a client, not as a 'server' listening to requests. This design makes your systems hack proof and secure.
- Remote user identities are maintained at and authentication is provided by Tally.NET. You decide which user gets what level of access to your data; this information is stored with the company data. Data when moved between systems will carry these restrictions, embedded within.

Deployment Design

- Take the example of an office with multiple users (Tally.ERP 9 Gold). You require that specific program extensions, customizations and programmed controls be used by everyone in your office. With Tally.NET you configure a deployment package and apply security restrictions. These packages and security controls are deployed automatically to all users. This central deployment architecture can be extended across all your locations!
- Remote users also get these deployed to their copy of Tally.ERP 9 automatically, for the period of remote access. This ensures that customizations are automatically available to all users having authorised access.
